Money for Castro

THOSE who have protested the deal now being negotiated for ransom of 1,113 Bay of Pigs prisoners are not stone-hearted pragmatists who cannot see the humanitarian side of the picture. Like everyone e se, they sympathize with the relatives and friends of these men Fidel Castro has held for 18 months.

They also know that the United States bears great responsibility for their imprisonment and an ultinate obligation to secure their freedom. After all, it was the last-minute withdrawal of U.S. air support for he invasion which we had encourged that cost these men their free-

There are, however, many good nd valid reasons for questioning the visdom of this deal which New York awyer James Donovan (who negotited the release of U2 pilot Francis or the U.S. Senate) is attempting to leased." each with Castro.

FIRST. ransom pay-off the whether in the form of dollars, food or medicine) can only perpetuate the Castro tyranny. It will lengthen the enterice of the other 90,000 political prisoners languishing in Cuban jails. t will postpone the day when the 6 million people of Cuba will be liberated from their communist enslavement.

Food, medicine and money paid o Castro in ransom obviously will help provide the needs of thousands of Russian and communist-bloc troops that have arrived over the past two months in Cuba. Some will also go to Cuban communist troops and officials, but it is doubtful that the Cuban people will receive any Timing of this deal is particularly unwise, for it coincides with official protests by Congress and the adminstration to our NATO allies who have been shipping supplies to Cuba.

If the United States now sends on even permits private groups to send upwards of 62 million dollars' worth of supplies to Cuba (the amount Castro demanded), our allies will be alle to argue, with good reason, that they have been doing nothing so great to perpetuate Castro's regime.

When they have shipped supplies to Cuba, at least they have been paid for them and taken something away from Castro's near-bankrupt treas-

THOUGH the administration has attempted to stay out of the ransom deal officially, it is apparent that it is deeply involved.

An Associated Press dispatch concedes that "the American taxwayer apparently will have to pay a place of the bill if prisoners taken in bary Powers and is now a candidate abortive Cuban invasion are re-

> The dispatch said that CIA funds sed and the President's emergency fund undoubtedly will be tapped. There is no question, of course, that the administration is supporting the effort, however undercover that support may be.

If it were opposed to the ransom deal, it would invoke the statutes which prohibit private citizens from negotiating with agents of a foreign power.

This support from the administration not only runs counter to the statements of U.S. policy, authorized within the past two weeks by Congress, but it also places the United States in a ridiculous light in the eyes of the rest of the world. Irrespective of the humanitarian motive, the deal will be viewed by most as a serious blow to U.S. prestige. The paymen of blood-money on Castro's demand will be seen as an admission of U.S timidity and willingness to be pushed around by any and every two-bit
